In 2007, my family took a trip to San Francisco. We sailed out of the pier on a cruise to Canada and Alaska, but the few days prior to that we spent touring San Francisco. I remember the tall buildings, very steep hills, the bay that surrounded the city, and the bridges that connected it all. We rented a car to drive around and I remember how different the streets were there compared to the suburbs of Orange County. The building sky line looked like steps and buildings were at every height. I clearly remember the balance of nature- the water and trees, in contrast to the very dense city. It was very populated and crowded in the main parts of the city, but much more calm and quiet on some parts near the pier, where this photo was taken.

As for my meaningful childhood object, I chose a skateboard. When I was young, my older sister had a skateboard in the garage that she never really used. I took a heavy interest in it and really wanted to learn how to ride it. I would practice everyday in the backyard until I got the basics down, then eventually began to ride it in the front yard and on the street. The reason this was an important object for me though is because as I got better, my dad and I would design and build wooden ramps and obstacle courses for me to use it on. The time we spent together building things was very memorable for me, even moreso than riding the skateboard itself. This also got me into woodworking at a very young age, which is a strong hobby of mine now as an adult.
